Not illustrated. 1910 Excerpt: . value of what I learned from them can scarcely be measured in dollars and cents. The influence of some of the older professors is to me far more commensurate with the money invested in a college education. As showing the versatility of the college-bred man the following is taken from the reply of a recent graduate: When the financial scare occurred last fall, the company dismissed several of its design corps. They called two or three of us who were college men and told us that we were to be retained, because they knew they could put us anywhere in the plant when there was not much designing to be done. The vice-president of a prominent concern wrote curtly as follows: In regard to the part of your letter relating to statistics, I must say that I have no use for data of this kind and shall absolutely decline to contribute. A graduate of the engineering department who has had a great deal of experience in practical affairs wrote at length in response to the formal request for information; the following paragraphs are quoted from his letter: There is no question in the minds of thinking and progressive business men that a technical education, thoroughly instilled and applied with common sense, is the best equipment a man can have. Mr. Crane loses sight of the fact that technical training does not make mechanics nor is it intended to make mechanics, but it does train men...
