GAO reviewed the Armys Continuing Balance System-Expanded (CBSX) central logistics system, focusing on whether: (1) internal controls for managing and maintaining accountability for Army equipment are adequate; and (2) equipment records maintained by individual Army units are accurate. GAO found that: (1) the Armys resources may be improperly wasted and its readiness impaired because the information it uses for equipment purchases, distribution, and deployment is not reliable; (2) CBSX contains unreliable information due to unexplained equipment balance fluctuations, poor unit records management, and accounting errors; (3) Army unit records often do not reflect on-hand equipment quantities and types because units do not record equipment promptly or accurately or complete physical counts; (4) Army regulations do not provide specific procedures to ensure that unit-level records are accurate and oversight measures have been implemented; (5) Army units cannot ensure that equipment is protected from loss or is being used as authorized; and (6) the Army needs to modify its procedures to improve unit inventory accounting, fully implement its oversight program, and improve regulations governing equipment records management.
