In a meadow bordering the swamp I heard the whistle of the meadowlark and soon discovered first here, then there, one of the birds stalking along, his gray and brown stripped head projecting above the brown grass and stubble with which the color of his back blended perfectly. When the clear, confident, persuasive whistle of the meadow-lark comes up from the meadow, then we feel sure that winter has lost its grip--it is indeed, Spring o the year, even though it be the twenty-fifth of March. I saw nothing of the red winged blackbirds, but on Tuesday along a little stream bordered with a grove of elms, maples and evergreens we found them and heard their liquid call coop-er-dee. Here the grackles were so numerous that their squeaky shrill call nearly drowned the fainter bird notes....
